

THE WESTERN EVENING HERALD
PLYMOUTH, DEVON, ENGLAND
25 NOVEMBER 1909
(page 2)

NOTES OF THE DAY.

There was a delightful biographical sketch given in the court of Session, Edinburgh, yesterday in the Court of Session, Edinburgh, yesterday about a Count Skellet, who later called himself MacGregor, and still later (as the effect of a distinction conferred on him by an Indian chief) Lord Boleskine. He also invented a new kind of religion (which seems like achieving the impossible), was a "Cabalist" and studied ancient manuscripts. The Court was also told that his father was stupid where money was concerned, which may explain why his son bought the estate of Boleskine, which contained a lot of land, "but it was mostly perpendicular." (Hence the owner's aspirations.) We sadly miss any reference to the Hatter or the Hare; Alice herself could not be admitted to the Court.