

The International

HOW TO KEEP WARM

WEATHER prophets prophesy that this month will be the coldest February on record. What with coalless days and heatless nights you will indeed feel chilly. But do not despair. Through fortitude you can best serve your country. The solution to your difficulties, however, can easily be found. Buy the February number of The International. It will give you the warmth which physical heat is incapable of inspiring. The International hasn't got a grouch. There is love, life and laughter in every page.

Aleister Crowley's article "Wanted—Moderate Men," is the sort of thing you have been wanting to read if you are interested in international events.

But if you desire fiction read the sixth Simon Iff story. It is a powerful, gruesome, thrilling tale of one of the most unusual murders ever recorded.

Then there is a fine story by Konrad Bercevic with an unexpected twist.

Do you know what Absinthe is? In France it is forbidden to drink this insidious liquid, but there are places in America where you can get all you want. Aleister Crowley describes an Absinthe Inn in New Orleans. It is a wonderful article filled with atmosphere.

George Sylvester Viereck discusses men and women from a new view point.

"With the Armies in Mittel-Europa" will certainly appeal to you. They are translations from the best journalists abroad and picture war as it actually is.

These are only a few of the many unusual contributions in this issue. Each article is distinguished by an individuality which, we can say without boasting, can only be found in The International.
